Happiness was measured before and after the seven days of kindness. The researchers found that being kind to ourselves or to anyone else – yes, even a stranger – or actively observing kindness around us boosted happiness. Choose kindness. While we may not have control over another person, we do have control over ourselves.

According to Lee Rowland –lead author of the paper, director of research at Kindness.org (which supported the research), and research associate at the University of Oxford –being kind to others, whether or not we are close to them, may be inherently rewarding for us and activate an evolved neuro-biological system involved in caring for others. He also suggests that observing kindness is a way of noticing the good around us –rather than seeing a world full of stress and bad news –which ...

What Type of Kindness Will Make You Happiest?

The groups that practiced kindness and engaged in novel acts both experienced a significant –and roughly equal –boost in happiness; the third group didn't get any happier. The findings suggest that good deeds do in fact make people feel good –even when performed over as little as 10 days –and there may be particular benefits to varying our acts of kindness, as novelty seems linked to happiness as well.

Kindness Makes You Happy – and Happiness Makes You –

Not only does kindness make us and others feel good, studies have demonstrated that the psychological benefits of kindness are actually reflected in the neural circuitry of the brain. [2] When we allow ourselves to be kind, regularly engaging in random acts of kindness, we create neural pathways that enhance feelings of well-being and the natural flow of feel-good endorphins and mood elevating neurotransmitters.
